How can we care for others without first caring for ourselves and each other?

Open source often collapses because care work is unpaid, maintainers burn out, or moderators absorb harm.

Burnout is structural, not personal weakness.
Maintenance cannot rely on unpaid sacrifice.

If life intervenes, we slow down, we redistribute tasks.

Timelines and budgets should be shaped by life realities.

People first.

Neoliberal policies have for the last two decades re-organised the basic care provisions that were previously considered cornerstones of democratic life, turning them into tools for surveilling, excluding and punishing the most vulnerable.

There is a need to revisit piracy and its philosophical implications - such as sharing, openness, decentralisation, free access to knowledge and tools - in the light of transformations in access to social goods brought about by digital networks.
